— FROM SCAPEGOAT TO TARGET

I was trained for this job before I ever applied.

How a scapegoat childhood taught me to give bullies too many chances.

Youngest of nine. The scapegoat.

In a narcissistic family, people get roles. The scapegoat carries the blame, so the family never has to change.

I wrote in my memoir that I was “the least believed. The most conditioned to be seen as an unreliable narrator of my own experiences.”

Then I got a job.

SAME PLAY, NEW STAGE

Family roles, workplace roles

AT HOME		AT WORK
The scapegoat	→	The “problem employee”
Siblings doing a parent's dirty work	→	Coworkers repeating the narrative
“Don't air the family business”	→	“Keep it within the team”
Being called a liar	→	“That never happened”
The golden child	→	The agreeable one who gets promoted

My hypervigilance looked like patience.

I was trained to anticipate mistakes, mine and everyone else's. So I kept giving chances. I kept waiting for people to do the right thing.

Because admitting they wouldn't meant admitting I was on my own again.

RESEARCH NOTE

Lots of people would rather justify a mistake than admit it.

Social psychologists Carol Tavris and Elliot Aronson describe self-justification: once someone has hurt you, admitting it threatens how they see themselves, so they rewrite the story instead.

More chances won't change someone who needs you to be the problem.

A different way to give chances

1. Give one chance, and name it out loud.
2. Write down what happened the same day.
3. Tell one safe person, outside of work.
4. Pay attention to what people do more than to their apologies.
5. Let “I see the pattern” be enough. You don't need them to agree.

Part 2: The Least Believed

What a childhood as the scapegoat taught me, and what it cost me at work.
